There would be nothing unusual about this announcement if it were not that the lieutenant colonel is a woman, a beauty, and a belle.

Miss liutt belongs to an Augusta, Ga., coterie that has been known for its lovely and witty women. She is not in any sense of the word "a new woman" yet she has just had conferred upon her this distinctly new tide. For Governor Atkinson, of Georgia, has established a precedent and created a sensation in giving to an American girl the title which only royal women bear by right of inheritance to their own standing armies.

Miss Butt accompanied Governor Atkin-son and staff to the Tennessee centennial and there, dressed in fluffy muslin and picture hat, with white gloved hands on jeweled sword hilt, she was presented to Governor Taylor and staff in the dignified terms given in the opening sentence of this article.

terms given in the opening sentence of this article.

Miss Butt got her unique appointment through a bit of girlish patriotism. She was visiting her sister—another beautiful woman—Mrs. Warren, in Richmond, Va. during the reunion. She made up her mind that Georgia, her state, should be honored and recognized. With a will she went to work and decorated the house with the Georgia colors and flags. In the front of the balcony she arranged with artistic ingenuity Georgia's coat of arms. The house, on the great day, was one glowing tribute to her own state.

As Governor Atkinson and staff rode to the exercises of the day they passed the house and instantly recognizing the compliment, saluted the malden who stood on the plazza waving her handkerchief.

As they returned from the exercises they colled upon her and invited her to assist in an informal reception. The governor's staff knew Miss Butt socially, and she helped them so attractively in Richmond's social duties that Governor Atkinson said so much and grace should have a commission on his staff. It goes without saying that the staff were ready to a man to vote the proposition through, and when Miss Butt was formally appointed, they presented her with an elaborately jewied sword. Whether the fair licutenant colonel will ever wield it in warfare for her country's sake is another question of the advancement of women, but as she is a most daintly built little lady, she probably cannot hold the weapon out straight. But probably the young dogs of war on the governor's staff would act toward her as Kipling's man-o-war does to the liner—

"And when there comes a fightin', He tells her to go 'gome"

"As they returned from the exercises they triffing and Mr. McDanleis. You who imagine the dashing lieutenant colonel a new woman, with eyeglasses, short skirts, rational boots and advanced das on politic s and municipal government, had better change your theory. Miss Butt is slender, tail, blonde, feminine to the finger tips. She is the typical Southern lady. Not the kind that, on the stage in the so-called Southern drama, walks through her part in a fantastic print gown, with an accent a colored cotton-picker would disown; but the Bouthern lady of real life, with highborn manners, cordial, impulsive affections, all founces and ribbons, and harmless filtrations, and underneath it the quietness and strength to bear deprivations and real privations with dignity, and the grace to take riches without pride.

This particular Southern girl is exceedingly pretty. She has a faultless skin, coquettish, expressive gray eyes, with arched brows and sweeping lashes; a head of red-gold hair, that curls most bewitchingly around the temples. She is vivacious, but with an case of manner that makes her equal to all occassions. She knows how to dress, and yet confesses—as "Except for a dinner on the 18th and and of red-gold in property."

"Except for a dinner on the 12th and a lunchoon on the 8th at home, at which functions, if convenient to you, we should like you to be present, your time will be your own," is a clause in a recent invitation to a young woman to stop at one of the smart houses in Newport. This, read between the lines, really means to imply that perfect independence will be the order of things on the part of both hostess and guest, an arrangement which is embentity typical of the way we live now, and of the changes in the methods of entertaining in the last decade.
